Abstract: There occurred in the twentieth century the most remarkable episode in the history of human thought. A number of thinkers denied the existence of something we know with certainty to exist: consciousness, conscious experience: the subjective qualitative or phenomenological character or being of experiences: the experiential ‘what-it’s-likeness’ of experiences: experience, as I’ll call it. Others held back from the Denial, as I’ll call it, but claimed that it might be true—a claim no less remarkable than the Denial. I want to document some aspects of this episode, with particular reference to the rise of philosophical behaviourism, and the transformation of materialism from a consciousness affirming-view into a consciousness-denying view. [Some of the material appeared recently in the Times Literary Supplement but the talk is more academic and philosophical.]
